

JAMES W. CLYDE

James William Clyde was born in Springville, Utah, on August 31, 1856, one of the sons of George William and Jane McDonald Clyde. At the age of five he moved with his parents to Heber Valley where he settled, married, and raised his family.

James W. Clyde was active in civic affairs and educational activities. In the beginning of our history it states Henry Aird was the first president of the Heber Town Board, and Mr. Clyde was the first mayor when Heber was incorporated as a city. He was the first president of the Heber Town Board. When the town was incorporated, he served as its first mayor. While mayor, he purchased the generating equipment for the municipal power plant, and was active in promoting a municipal water system to replace wells.

He served as president of the Wasatch Irrigation Co., of the Strawberry Grazing Co., and of the Wasatch County School Board.

Active in politics—he was often called "Mr. Democrat"—he served in the House of Representatives, was chairman of the Democratic Party in Wasatch County, and was also state senator from Wasatch County. He was a member of the State Land Board.

Cities league makes surprising comeback

By Chuck Gates 9-21-85
Deseret News staff writer

No one attending the Utah League of Cities and Towns convention this week would suspect it was an organization on the verge of collapse just a few months ago.

Today, the league seems full of vitality and its members brimming with optimism.

Yet, just last May, the league hit rock bottom.

Disgruntled cities were openly critical of the direction the league was taking. Eight of the league's largest members were preparing to form their own "super" lobbying coalition independent of the league. And then there was the messy firing, or resignation, of Herschel Hester, the league's executive director.

Although the league's remarkable turnaround doesn't rank with the rise of the phoenix, it's worth noting as the league concludes its 78th annual convention at the Salt Palace Saturday. Part of the credit for the turnaround must go to the league's new executive director, Jan T. Furner, mayor of Heber City. Furner took over as the league's acting executive director after Hester's departure in May. He was recently appointed to the position permanently following a nationwide search.

Furner said the league is a service organization. But in the past, this was too often forgotten. Instead, there was a tendency on the part of league officials to dictate to the membership. Now, however, efforts are being made to get the rank and file members more involved in league decisions.

The league also made a popular move when it hired a full-time lobbyist to track and promote league interests on Capitol Hill. In the past, detractors complained the league was ineffective as a lobbying group.

You don't hear those complaints anymore. And prodigal cities such as American Fork are returning to the fold.

American Fork Mayor Malcolm Beck said that when his city withdrew from the league a few years back, he vowed not to return until changes were made. The fact he's back tells you something.

Beck said his city pulled out because the league wasn't meeting American Fork's needs. He felt the league, with its resources, should be the most powerful lobbying effort at the Legislature. Instead, it was one of the weakest. He said it seemed the cities and towns were going in one direction and the league the opposite. He's optimistic this trend has been reversed and the league is back on track.

Another city that split with the league, West Jordan, has yet to rejoin, but may be moving in that direction.

West Jordan City Councilman David Plouzek said whether his city rejoins the league depends largely on who wins and who loses the election in November. If a predominantly pro-league council is picked, West Jordan will probably be back. He said he thinks the gap between his city and the league is narrowing.

Ephraim Mayor Halbert K. Jensen said he wasn't a vocal critic of the league, but he felt changes were in order. Now, he said, the general sentiment at the convention is that progress is being made.

Richmond City Councilman L. Carl Howlett says the league's doing fine now, but then, he was never tremendously displeased with what it was doing before. In the past, he said, league officials sincerely tried, although they might not have been as effective as they wanted to be.

South Salt Lake Mayor Jim Davis waxed

philosophical. Davis, a former league president, said there's a sense of unity among the league's membership that hasn't existed in the past. But Davis kiddingly cautioned, "We're still in the honeymoon phase. We still have to go through the Legislature and that's where we usually fall apart."

Joseph Hylton

Joseph Hylton became mayor in 1946, and had as city officers Allen Curry, Fred G. Carlile, Joseph Olpin, Harold H. Smith and Walter Har- rison, councilmen: Venice H. Watson, treasurer; Everett Murdock and E. Warren Jones, city marshals.

During his administration, Mayor Hylton began plans for a new power plant in Snake Creek Canyon. Equipment for the plant was ordered and the construction work started while he was mayor. Plans were also approved for the city airport and the joint City-County Memorial Build- ing. Zoning ordinances for the city were also effected by Mayor Hylton.
